

The main thing that you simply identify is usually that the noise is on its way from the air moving through the vents. And then suggest sure how the vents are not broken or partly screwed up. If they are partially closed you will find out if they are just closed by mistake or to balance these devices. Remember that if you close some within the vents your own air moved by the blower must be forced away from other vents in this system. If there is too much air for your remaining vents to handle then they will become noisy. Sometimes there just simply is insufficient space for the air to get out because there is a shortage of vents installed in the arrangement. I have seen many systems that this way because the contractor thought we would skimp to lessen costs by the installation.
