My colleagues and that i revealed a pair of different views on the way forward for "work from home" and remote work last Friday - a story that, David Humphries 5 Step Formula if analytics is any signal, really struck a nerve with a lot of you. That shouldn't be surprising particularly in the tech business, where data work basically means we spend the vast majority of our time in an "office." Everything from minor annoyances (they minimize down the scale of the Klondike bars in the mini-kitchen!) to massive complaints (I am making an attempt to think by a posh ML algorithm as my open-office colleagues are having a Nerf battle!) is magnified given the time we spend in these environments. Understandably, the mandatory Work From Home scenario that many of us discover ourselves in isn't superb. Schools are closed, children are house, internet is wonky since everyone else is home, 5 Step Formula review the canine sitter isn't coming and there are no cafés to find sojourn. It's not stunning

then that there's something of a popular revulsion and revolt to the entire WFH notion, even as giant tech companies like Twitter say they'll completely offer Work From Home as an option. (Image: <https://yewtu.be/VLnqS8rQYE4>)
