As vaccinations and relaxed well being tips make returning to the workplace a actuality for extra firms, there seems to be a disconnect between managers and their employees over remote work. An excellent example of this can be a recent op-ed written by the CEO of a Washington, D.C., magazine that urged staff could lose benefits like well being care in the event that they insist on continuing to work remotely because the COVID-19 pandemic recedes. The staff reacted by refusing to publish for a day. While the CEO later apologized, she isn't alone in showing to bungle the transition again to the office after over a year during which tens of thousands and thousands of employees had been pressured to work from home.
